During childhood, people in the United Kingdom, like those in most other countries, are not as likely to be exposed to the disease as children in the United States (Figure 1). However, the United Kingdom has a high incidence of Chlamydia trachomatis infection among sexually active young adults. In 1990, the first diagnosis was in a girl and the first outbreak among the heterosexual community in Great Britain occurred in 1991. The first cases were identified by the national venereal disease notification system in England, Wales, and Scotland, and laboratory confirmation was made by polymerase chain reaction (PCR) and immunoblotting.

In England, following the first diagnosis, 100 cases were notified in 1991. In Scotland, the first notification was in 1992, and in Wales, the first notification was in 1993. The notification system in the United Kingdom is based on the 1984 Venereal Diseases (Notification) Regulations, which require notification of all venereal diseases, including Chlamydia trachomatis. Since then, the notification system has been revised, and notification of Chlamydia trachomatis is now required for all cases, including those in children and young adults. The most important findings were consistent: that the 100% parties following the onset of the crisis in the United States and the United Kingdom had the best performance going forward. While the 100% parties (1/3) were caught in other traps, they consistently achieved better results.
