the other, might also be a result of the fact that the two studies used different samples or that there is some sort of bias in the sample of firms that are included in the database. In the first paper, the sample was drawn from the 1990s, while in the second, the sample was drawn from the 2000s. It is possible that the two samples are not representative of the population of firms in the United States. For example, the sample in the first paper might be biased towards firms that are more likely to be included in the database, while the sample in the second paper might be biased towards firms that are less likely to be included in the database. This could lead to different results for the two studies.
