

Walt Disney Organizational Structure

The Walt Disney Company's organizational structure looks most like a horizontal structure. Horizontal structure is based on departmentalization or subdividing the organization into subunits (Bateman & Snell, 2011). The Disney Company has five business segments: interactive media, studio entertainment, consumer products, parks and resorts, and media networks. These departments are grouped by product which is a great example of the divisional approach. Each product is closely related to the other as they all are about entertainment in one form or another, but they do still have their own descriptions. The interactive media segment uses digital media to create high-quality interactive entertainment since it was founded in 2008. The studio entertainment segment is a segment on which the company was built. Stage plays, music, and movies are brought to people everywhere through this segment. The consumer products segment brings engaging and innovative product experiences from clothing and toys to fine art and books to the public.

Millions of guests each and every year take the opportunity to spend their vacations and making memories at one of the world's leading providers of leisure and family travel experiences, at a Walt Disney park or resort. The media networks segment is made up of various cable, broadcast, publishing, and radio businesses over two divisions. The divisions are ESPN Inc., and the Disney/ABC Television group ("Our businesses: the Walt Disney company", n.d.). The Disney Company could use a functional approach and group their departments or jobs by the skills needed to perform them. An example would be a marketing division which would take care of marketing company wide.

With the divisional approach, each business function would have their own marketing division. If the functional and divisional forms overlapped they would have a matrix organization. Staff would have two bosses to report to, functional manager and divisional manager. Now they have a dual line of command instead of a single line of command. The upside to a matrix organization is the company would be more flexible and would be able to adapt to change quicker. The downside would be the difficult interpersonal situations and potential confusion that having two bosses could cause.

Organizational functions

Organizational functions are the result of the departmentalization of an organization. Departments are grouped according to business function and their needed skillset. Some companies divide their organizational functions according to their organizational structure. Others let their organizational functions determine their organizational structure. For instance, one business function that can influence the organizational structure of the Walt Disney Company would be human resources. Human resources is a critical function that is needed for any business to be successful. Without the ability to hire the proper people according to the organizational culture, the business would more than likely fail. At Disney, there are many job classifications, but there is only one common goal of guest satisfaction. Disney believes that their human resource culture is a major part of their long-term
