Abstract

The purpose of this study was to determine whether there were differences in the prevalence of risk factors for low back pain between two groups of nurses working in different departments of a hospital. The sample consisted of 100 nurses from the intensive care unit and 100 nurses from the medical-surgical department. Data were collected by means of a questionnaire containing information about sociodemographic variables, work-related variables, and health status. A chi-square test was used to compare the prevalence of each variable between the two groups. The results showed that the prevalence of risk factors for low back pain was higher among nurses from the intensive care unit than among nurses from the medical-surgical department. The prevalence of risk factors for low back pain was significantly higher among nurses from the intensive care unit than among nurses from the medical-surgical department.

Keywords: low back pain; prevalence; risk factors; nurses

Introduction

Low back pain (LBP) is one of the most common musculoskeletal disorders in the world (García-Bermejo et al., 2006). It is a complex condition that can be caused by many factors, such as physical, psychological, and social factors (García-Bermejo et al., 2006). LBP is a major public health problem because it causes significant disability and economic burden (García-Bermejo et al., 2006).

Nurses are at a high risk of developing LBP due to their job requirements, which often involve prolonged periods of standing, lifting, and bending over (García-Bermejo et al., 2006). In addition, nurses may experience stress and fatigue, which can also contribute to the development of LBP (García-Bermejo et al., 2006).

The purpose of this study was to determine whether there were differences in the prevalence of risk factors for LBP between two groups of nurses working in different departments of a hospital. The sample consisted of 100 nurses from the intensive care unit (ICU) and 100 nurses from the medical-surgical department. Data were collected by means of a questionnaire containing information about sociodemographic variables, work-related variables, and health status. A chi-square test was used to compare the prevalence of each variable between the two groups.

The results showed that the prevalence of risk factors for LBP was higher among nurses from the ICU than among nurses from the medical-surgical department. The prevalence of risk factors for LBP was significantly higher among nurses from the ICU than among nurses from the medical-surgical department.

This study has several limitations. First, the sample size was relatively small, which may have affected the generalizability of the findings. Second, the study was cross-sectional, so it cannot establish causality between the variables. Finally, the questionnaire method may have introduced some bias into the data collection process.

In conclusion, this study found that the prevalence of risk factors for LBP was higher among nurses from the ICU than among nurses from the medical-surgical department. These findings suggest that nurses working in the ICU may be at a higher risk of developing LBP than nurses working in the medical-surgical department. Further research is needed to explore the underlying reasons for these differences and to develop interventions to reduce the risk of LBP among nurses.
