On 10 May 1997, the Journal of the American Medical Association published a study by the National Cancer Institute (NCI) that showed that the use of tamoxifen in the treatment of breast cancer was associated with an increased risk of developing blood clots. The study was a retrospective analysis of data from the NCI's Breast International Group (BIG) trial, which compared the use of tamoxifen with the use of the drug torelone in the treatment of breast cancer. The study found that the use of tamoxifen was associated with a 1.5-fold increase in the risk of developing blood clots compared with the use of torelone. The study also found that the risk of developing blood clots was higher in patients who had a history of blood clots or who were taking other medications that increase the risk of blood clots. These findings suggest that the use of a computerized form, instead of a written questionnaire, may be a more effective way to collect information on the use of the Internet. However, the use of a computerized form may also have some limitations. For example, the use of a computerized form may be more expensive than the use of a written questionnaire. Also, the use of a computerized form may be more difficult to use for some people, especially those who are not familiar with computers. Therefore, the use of a computerized form should be carefully considered before it is used in a research study.

There are many reasons why the results of this study may not be generalizable to other populations. First, the sample was drawn from a single institution, which may limit the applicability of the findings to other settings. Second, the study was conducted during a specific time period, which may affect the results. Finally, the study was limited to a specific population of students, which may not represent the broader student body.
