Introduction: DNA as a forensic tool has been used to link suspects to crime scene evidence for the past three decades. The latest breakthrough in DNA forensics, Rapid DNA testing, promises to be a disruptive new technology that will dramatically improve the effectiveness of criminal justice systems worldwide. By reducing the turnaround time of suspect samples from days, weeks or even months to 90 minutes, law enforcement officials, forensic scientists and prosecutors can apply this tool to a wider variety of crimes. They are preparing for this amazing breakthrough by validating the technology, running pilot studies and examining workflows to make sure they can quickly take full advantage of Rapid DNA. This paper describes the current state of DNA as a forensic tool, the emerging technology of Rapid DNA, and some early uses of the first commercial implementation of Rapid DNA – the IntegenX RapidHIT™ 200 Human Identification System.

DNA in Forensics, current situation

DNA evidence – a human identification technique based on measurements of the length of pre-determined locations, or loci, on the human genome, is far more accurate than physical fingerprints. It is often left behind crime scenes in the form of blood, saliva on drink bottles and cigarette butts, and even by touching surfaces such as broken glass, door knobs and window latches, affording many more opportunities to collect crime scene evidence than traditional fingerprints. Concerns of violating genetic privacy are unfounded as this type of DNA analysis does not indicate any healthcare information. The loci chosen for identification purposes do not code for any known physical or genetic characteristics and is therefore not associated with privacy issues related to genetic disposition to inherited diseases. A powerful tool, DNA identification is most often used for violent crimes (murders and sexual assaults) and other major crimes as forensic capacity allows. As our reliance on DNA evidence has grown, so have crime lab backlogs. In the U.S., state, regional and local crime labs are hard pressed to keep up with demand in spite of the growing use of highly automated workstations that perform the majority of routine tasks such as extraction, purification, amplification by PCR, separation by capillary electrophoresis and detection. Data analysis can also be automated with forensic review for final determination. However, once DNA profiles from suspects and/or crime scene evidence have been determined in the crime lab, the value comes from comparing suspect samples to crime scenes – either the current crime scene or past unsolved cases. Enumeration of suspects that don't match the crime scene data prevents unnecessary law enforcement effort and costs of investigating the wrong suspects, and focuses efforts and financial resources on the right suspects. To accomplish this requires the use of one or more data bases to search suspect profiles against crime scene evidence. Most crimes are not singular events but repeated by the same perpetrators over and over until caught and prosecuted. The U.S. National Offender Database, called CODIS (Combined DNA Index
