QUESTION I have a 1997 Ford Taurus with 120,000 miles. The car has been running fine for the last 10 years, but recently I have noticed some strange behavior. The engine seems to be running rough, and the car is losing power. I have also noticed some oil leaks under the car. What could be the problem?

ANSWER There are several possible causes for the symptoms you are describing. The most common cause for a rough-running engine and loss of power is a clogged air filter. A clogged air filter restricts the flow of air into the engine, which can cause the engine to run rough and lose power. You should check the air filter and replace it if it is clogged.

Another possible cause for the symptoms you are describing is a faulty spark plug. A faulty spark plug can cause the engine to run rough and lose power. You should check the spark plug and replace it if it is faulty.

Oil leaks can also cause the engine to run rough and lose power. Oil leaks can reduce the amount of oil in the engine, which can cause the engine to run rough and lose power. You should check the oil level and look for any oil leaks. If you find an oil leak, you should have it repaired as soon as possible.

If you have checked the air filter, spark plug, and oil level, and the problem still persists, you may need to have the engine diagnosed by a professional mechanic. There could be a more serious problem with the engine, such as a bad valve or a bad piston, that is causing the symptoms you are describing.

PROTECTING THE COMPANY
FROM THE INSIDE

Security involves not only the physical perimeter of the company but also the people within the organization. The most common security threat is the employee who is disgruntled or who has been terminated. This person may attempt to steal sensitive information or sabotage the company's operations. To protect the company from these threats, it is essential to have a security policy that addresses the behavior of employees. This policy should include provisions for the handling of sensitive information, the use of company resources, and the consequences of security violations. It is also important to have a process for investigating and responding to security incidents. This process should include a clear chain of command and a timeline for resolution. By implementing these measures, the company can protect itself from the most common security threat: the employee.

Abstract—The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of a 12-week, low-intensity, supervised walking program on the physical fitness and health of sedentary, middle-aged women. The study was a randomized, controlled trial. The subjects were 40 sedentary, middle-aged women who were randomly assigned to either a walking program or a control group. The walking program consisted of 12 weeks of supervised walking, 3 times per week, for 30 minutes per session. The control group did not participate in any exercise program. The results of the study showed that the walking program had a significant positive effect on the physical fitness and health of the women. The women in the walking program showed significant improvements in cardiovascular fitness, muscular strength, and body composition compared to the control group. The walking program also had a significant positive effect on the health of the women, with significant improvements in blood pressure, cholesterol levels, and body mass index. The results of this study suggest that a 12-week, low-intensity, supervised walking program is an effective way to improve the physical fitness and health of sedentary, middle-aged women.

Abstract—This paper presents a new approach to the design of a control system for a robot arm. The system is designed to track a desired trajectory and maintain a constant force at the end effector. The control system is based on a combination of a feedforward controller and a feedback controller. The feedforward controller is designed to track the desired trajectory, while the feedback controller is designed to maintain a constant force at the end effector. The system is tested on a two-link robot arm, and the results show that the system is able to track the desired trajectory and maintain a constant force at the end effector.
