

SECONDARY STORAGE DEVICES

Secondary storage devices are also known as Auxiliary Storage Devices. The auxiliary storage devices store system programs, large data files, assemblers, compilers and other programs. In other words auxiliary storage devices are used for bulk storage of data. The storage capacity of these devices is unlimited as an empty device can replace them once the existing device is completely filled.

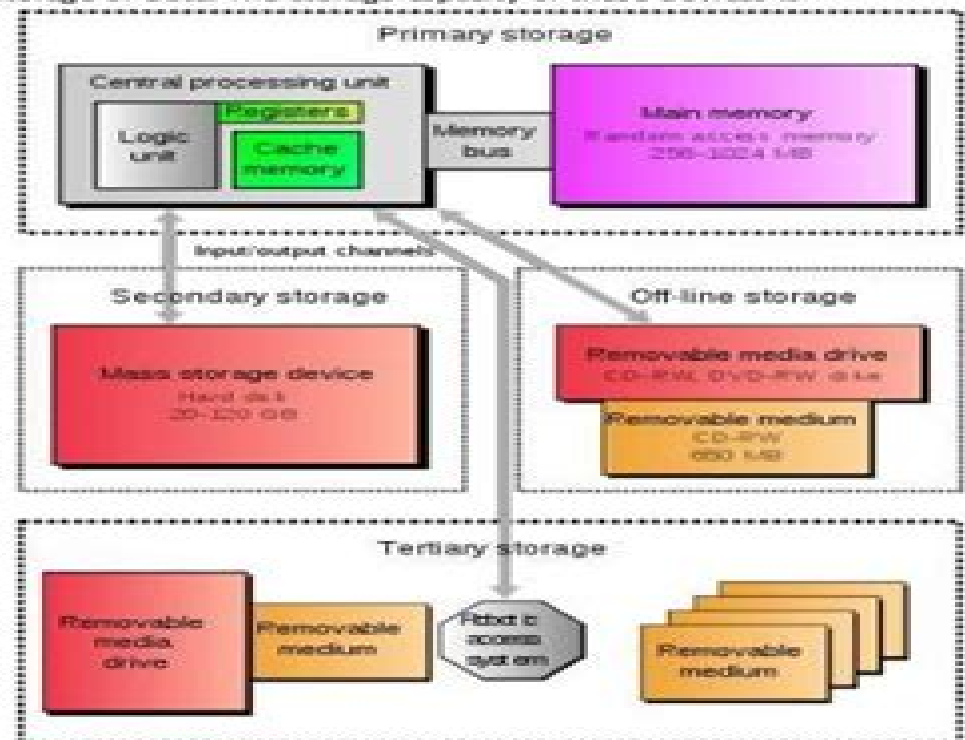

The secondary storage is permanent in nature i.e. the information stored in these devices does not lost unless it is specifically deleted. Secondary storage devices being permanent in nature can be used for the transportation of data from one computer to another.

Secondary storage devices are cheaper as compared to the main memory. The information stored in secondary memory are first transferred to the main memory and then processed by the CPU. The final result may then be placed in the secondary memory. It is because of this that the access time of the secondary memory is comparatively high.

There are four types of secondary storage devices which are discussed below.

These are:

- Hard Disk.
- Compact Disc.
- USB (Universal Significant Bit).
- Blu-Ray Disc.

HARD DISK DRIVE

The hard disk drive was primarily developed with the reason to provide a secondary storage device which is fast and have higher capacity and compactness as well as that is much reliable as a data storage system. As it is known that hard disk drive is basically an internal. In some cases it can also be external. The advantage regarding the external hard disk drive is that it is easy to move the data and user information from one place to another. The other forms of data transfer can be made on network itself. But the external hard disk drive is used to transfer the data that is quite large enough; and which cannot be moved over the network.
