algorithms and are useful in many applications. We can think of a search engine as a backward-chaining engine using unification—that is, finding values for variables so that we know whether two terms unify. These values, often the unified terms, often then replace the variables in the original expression. This is the approach taken by definite clause programming systems, which are efficient, simple, and robust mechanisms for problem solvers. Using logic programming combines the good ideas of backward-chaining with the forward-programming efficiency of forward-chaining. It is also simpler, the finding knowledge base, which means that the programmer need never know about infinite loops. It is well suited to get an initial idea, will produce the solution set, it is the other is a powerful algorithmic method of solving.

Finding can be done in many ways, as discussed in Section 9.4.1. The naive method is to try all possible values for the variables, and every possible value will be a solution.
