Abstract: Staphylococcus aureus is a leading cause of nosocomial infection and resistance to infection control measures is a major public health concern. The purpose of this study was to determine the prevalence of S. aureus in the hospital environment and to identify risk factors for colonization. A total of 100 S. aureus isolates were collected from the hospital environment and 100 isolates were collected from patients. The isolates were tested for resistance to various antibiotics and for the presence of the mecA gene. The results showed that 100% of the isolates were resistant to penicillin and 100% of the isolates were resistant to methicillin. The mecA gene was detected in 100% of the isolates. The results suggest that the hospital environment is a major source of colonization and that resistance to infection control measures is a major public health concern.

There are two other interesting questions that I have been asked recently and that are related to the above question. The first is: "What is the best way to measure the effectiveness of a training program?" The second is: "What is the best way to measure the effectiveness of a training program?"
