

1. Abstract Background: The literature suggests that the implementation of structural and policy changes in the workplace may reduce the prevalence of musculoskeletal disorders (MSDs). However, the extent to which these changes are implemented is variable. This study examined the implementation of workplace changes in a large manufacturing plant. Methods: The plant was divided into two groups: the intervention group, which implemented changes, and the control group, which did not. Data were collected from 1998 to 2002. Results: The implementation of changes was incomplete. The control group showed a higher prevalence of MSDs than the intervention group. Conclusions: The implementation of changes in the workplace is a complex process. The control group showed a higher prevalence of MSDs than the intervention group.
