O'Connell,Prescott College. Education / Sustainability Education,2012 This dissertation was an exploration of how changing the waste system is a necessary part of achieving sustainable human systems and how transforming consumer attitudes towards waste is a vital piece of sustainable waste management This research was also an exploration of the attitudes and beliefs that promote and prohibit waste reduction behaviors The unsustainable character of current waste systems was explained and put into an historical context This research focused on how household waste plays a role in waste systems and how the waste behaviors and attitudes of individuals play a role in moving from a linear system of waste disposal to a cyclical system of waste recovery This dissertation argues for the need to have a deeper understanding of how to elicit changes in waste attitudes and behaviors The results of a participatory action research project with a group of residents to reduce household solid waste in a rural U S town are presented The results from this study indicated that by employing the methods used in this project people can be motivated to not only change their behaviors to reduce waste but to encourage others to adopt those behaviors The term catalyzing stewardship is used to describe how participants engaged others in waste reduction This term connotes the sharing of ideas and practices without implying that the individuals took on a leadership role Methods to reduce waste undertaken by individuals organizations and municipalities are discussed This research has added to the dialogue about how to increase environmental stewardship behaviors specifically those that involve waste reduction
