How Compassion Made Us Human Penelope Spikins,2015-05-07 An intriguing look at how our capacity to care about and connect with others has contributed to our evolutionary success as a species Our ability to care about the wellbeing of others whether they are close family or strangers can appear to be unimportant in today's competitive societies. But in this volume archaeologist Penny Spikins argues that compassion lies at the heart of what makes us human. She takes us on a journey from the earliest Stone Age societies two million years ago to the lives of Neanderthals in Ice Age Europe using archaeological evidence to illustrate the central role that emotional connections had in human evolution. Simple acts of kindness left to us from millions of years ago provide evidence for how social emotions and morality evolved and how our capacity to reach out beyond ourselves into the lives of others allowed us to work together for a common good and form the basis for human success.

In Search of In Vivo MSC Simone Pacini,Mario Petrini,2017-08-07 The concept of multipotent mesenchymal stromal cells MSCs arose from the work of A J Friedenstein and coworkers in which the authors observed that culturing human bone marrow BM cell suspensions in plastic dishes lead to isolation of proliferating adhered colonies of fibroblastoid cells able to differentiate into chondrocytes or osteoblasts in vitro and in vivo. Authors firstly described these cells as colony forming units of fibroblastoid cells (CFU-Fs) referring to their ability to form large colonies on plastic surfaces. The acronymous MSC became popular after the work of A. I. Caplan et al in 1991 where the authors proposed that in adult BM a population of stem cells could differentiate into different tissues originated from the mesodermal layer during embryonic development. They termed these cells as mesenchymal stem cells (MSCs). Later the multilineage differentiation capability of MSCs was then definitively demonstrated; these cells shown a stable phenotype expressing novel markers as CD105, CD73 and CD90 and could be expanded retaining the ability to differentiate in vitro into vary mesodermal tissues. Some investigators described these latest findings as the definitive characterization of the culture expanded CFU-F population originally described by Friedenstein group but the identity of the putative in vivo MSC remain enigmatic. Emerging interest in identifying the MSCs in vivo counterpart in order to indicate feasible prospective isolation methods lead to increasing number of ex vivo isolating immunological procedures. Nonetheless any effort failed to describe a definitive and widely accepted protocol and significantly contributed to the ongoing confusion in the description of the in vivo MSC identity. Mainly the inconclusive data about isolation of the putative MSC progenitor could be ascribed to the assumption that any marker expressed on culture expanded MSCs was also likely to be present in vivo. Consequently independent laboratories have begun to use different markers of cultured MSCs to search for MSCs in the source tissue. This has resulted in the perception that these in vivo progenitors were highly heterogeneous cell population and that the different protocols applied could lead to the isolation of distinct sub populations showing increased CFU-F frequencies. This issue is organized in two sections. In the first section there are collected articles regarding the effects of culture determinants on the heterogeneity of MSC preparations and how to interpret data from culture expanded cells. The second section presents contributes regarding the impact of MSCs and their in vivo counterpart on health and disease.
