Background: A study on biological stressors in a naturally occurring aquatic insect genus, the spiny chironomid Simulium (Diptera: Simuliidae) from North America was designed to determine what factors affect the genetic structure and evolution of these taxa. It has been well known in the community of evolutionary biologists that migration has strong effects on genetic divergence, but there are not well enough examples for Simulium biologists to understand what is known about genetic divergence in related insects.
