During the last years of his life, Wagner was suffering from a bad case of depression. Indeed, his Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg (1868) – influenced through a series of dramatic setbacks in 1866 that changed one of the great artists of the 19th century into a recluse – is a work that is almost all about the artist's struggle with depression. Wagner died, indeed, from a heart attack, probably self-inflicted, in 1883, after a long illness.

It is important to follow the life of Wagner, if not to avoid it, as it is to understand the political and artistic problems that he was facing. Wagner's life was a constant struggle with depression, and it was this struggle that led him to create some of the most important works of the 19th century. Wagner's life was a constant struggle with depression, and it was this struggle that led him to create some of the most important works of the 19th century.

The most important findings were consistent: that the 1000-hour rule was followed following licensure in the United States, and that the United States was the only country requiring general licensure. While the 1000-hour rule was found to have been followed in other countries, this requirement varied between 100 years on from the suffrage The 1918-1920 period has not only been a century of peace, but also the century of the British Empire. But it cannot be simply the story of empire and power in 1918. A. A. Brown, whose entry in this issue of ES is a contribution to the 1918-1920 period, looking at the United States to see the world again from a new angle. The fact is that the British Empire was not dead in 1918.
