1. Background: The study was a cross-sectional, population-based, nationwide, 1992-93 National Health and Nutrition Examination Survey (NHANES) study. The survey included 14,147 subjects aged 17 years and older. The survey was designed to assess the prevalence of various health conditions and to estimate the burden of disease in the United States.
2. Methods: The study used a complex, multistage sampling design. The first stage was a probability sample of counties and census tracts. The second stage was a probability sample of households within the selected areas. The third stage was a probability sample of individuals within the selected households. The survey included a physical examination, a medical history interview, and a questionnaire.
3. Results: The prevalence of hypertension was 25.5% among men and 21.5% among women. The prevalence of diabetes was 4.5% among men and 5.5% among women. The prevalence of heart disease was 12.5% among men and 10.5% among women. The prevalence of stroke was 3.5% among men and 2.5% among women. The prevalence of cancer was 15.5% among men and 14.5% among women.
4. Conclusions: The study found that the prevalence of major chronic diseases is high in the United States. The study also found that the prevalence of these diseases is higher among men than among women. The study also found that the prevalence of these diseases is higher among older adults than among younger adults.
