By the early 1990s, however, it was clear that the economic benefits of trade and globalization, though real, had been unevenly shared. There had been problems, notably the collapse in value of the Latin American debt, and a growing loss of faith in the capacity of the private sector to do the job. In the 1990s, however, economic globalization has continued to advance, and it is increasingly clear that the gains of the opening of markets, particularly in the US and elsewhere, have been significant. The fact remains, however, that the gains have not been shared equally, and that the problems of the poor, particularly in the developing world, remain a serious concern.
