Werewolves though and it doesn't take long for a hand to fist the back of her shirt clutching her and then pushing her down. She falls again but a hand lashes out and catches her before her knees hit the ground for the second time that day. The first thing she notices is the sharp claws around her waist, dark fur covering the entire arm, monstrous and terrifying. The second is the low purring breath close to her ear. Mine, he rumbles, and she feels something wet dripping onto her shoulders, sliding down until she can see the smear of red all over her clothes. She makes the mistake of looking up to see who's captured her and sees a truly terrifying face, sharp fangs and wolf-like but enough human characteristics to be uncanny. She yelps and tries to pull away but his arm tightens around her and she's lifting off the ground. What, what are you doing, he turns her around and lowers her onto the floor gently or probably as gently as he can manage. She's never seen a Werewolf before. He's huge, easily twice her size and height, looming over her and casting her in his shadows. The moon shines brightly behind him and she's too tired to run. Her eyes are drawn to his face, wolf-like and human at the same time, blood dripping from his jaws and his claws. Her shirt is smeared where he's caught her earlier and for a second she's afraid he's hurt her but she doesn't feel pain there, so it's not her blood. From the looks of it, it's not his blood either. He bends down until he is covering her with his body and presses his nose to her neck, breathing in deep. When he speaks again, it's a low rumbling growl that seems to shake the very ground she's laying on. Mine, he growls.
