Robert Holloway, 2011-09-14 After decades of avoiding occasionally fearing cats C

Robert Holloway adopts a rescue cat from the SPCA for the specific purpose of eradicating the rodent problem at his French Quarter apartment In admiration for a friends cat named Charlie he names him Charlie Too but quickly realizes the Too is too cumbersome and more bewildering his critter has little inclination for killing any living creature especially mice This distressing trait is in high contrast to Charlies captivating canine like social skills and an IQ rivaling the US Navys dolphins For the next seven years Charlie and CRHs bonding coalesces in a determination to be together whenever possible sharing eating and sleeping habits learning each others language mediating friends arguments amalgamating political persuasions even travelling together by plane and automobile across the USA Early on in their relationship Charlie demonstrates an inordinate fascination for CRHs laptop frequently reaches for the delete button and in the doing makes valuable editorial contributions Eventually he masters lifting the PCs lid and turning it on when CRH is away When Charlie becomes gravely ill CRH discovers his true age to be much older than originally listed by the SPCA Distressed by concern and grief he drags him to several Veterinary specialists in the area while begging Charlie to hold on until his condition can be properly diagnosed and a cure might be found Charlie rallies for a few months then just before Christmas succumbs to cancer of the liver Soon after his passing C Robert stumbles on a remarkable document which confirms the power of unconditional love the jubilation that comes from unwavering responsibility and on closer reading a poignant argument to give the concept of reincarnation another appraisal
