Abstract The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of a 12-week training program on the physical and psychological health of sedentary, middle-aged women. The study was a randomized controlled trial. The intervention group (n = 15) participated in a 12-week training program, while the control group (n = 15) remained sedentary. The training program consisted of three sessions per week, each lasting 45 minutes. The sessions included aerobic exercise, strength training, and flexibility exercises. The control group remained sedentary throughout the study. The primary outcome was the change in body mass index (BMI) over the 12-week period. Secondary outcomes included changes in waist circumference, blood pressure, heart rate, and self-reported stress levels. Data were collected at baseline and at the end of the 12-week period. Statistical analysis was performed using a t-test to compare the two groups. Introduction Sedentary lifestyle is a major public health concern, as it is associated with an increased risk of chronic diseases such as obesity, heart disease, and diabetes. Middle-aged women are particularly at risk, as they often experience a decline in physical activity levels as they age. A 12-week training program may be an effective intervention to improve physical and psychological health in this population. The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of a 12-week training program on the physical and psychological health of sedentary, middle-aged women.
Method The study was a randomized controlled trial. The intervention group (n = 15) participated in a 12-week training program, while the control group (n = 15) remained sedentary. The training program consisted of three sessions per week, each lasting 45 minutes. The sessions included aerobic exercise, strength training, and flexibility exercises. The control group remained sedentary throughout the study. The primary outcome was the change in body mass index (BMI) over the 12-week period. Secondary outcomes included changes in waist circumference, blood pressure, heart rate, and self-reported stress levels. Data were collected at baseline and at the end of the 12-week period. Statistical analysis was performed using a t-test to compare the two groups.	Results The intervention group showed a significant decrease in BMI (p < 0.05) compared to the control group. There was also a significant decrease in waist circumference (p < 0.05) and a significant increase in blood pressure (p < 0.05) in the intervention group. There were no significant differences in heart rate or self-reported stress levels between the two groups.	Conclusion A 12-week training program can significantly improve physical health in sedentary, middle-aged women. The program led to a significant decrease in BMI and waist circumference, and a significant increase in blood pressure. There were no significant differences in heart rate or self-reported stress levels between the two groups.
