OTRC Project Title: FPSO Roll Motions
 MMS Project 406 TO18033
 PI: Spyros A. Kinnas
 MMS COTR: A. Konczak

This report provides a comprehensive summary of the research completed in all prior Phases of this project (November 2000 – August 2004), and describes research being done in the present Phase (September 2004 – August 2005) to complete this project.

FPSO Roll Motions

Spyros A. Kinnas

Motivation:

FPSO (Floating Production systems for Storage and Off-loading) hulls have been reported to be subject to excessive roll motions (in some cases of 20 degrees amplitude), which may cause fatigue in mooring lines, disruption of operation, and discomfort to the crew. An economical solution to mitigate these roll motions is through the installation of bilge keels on these hulls.

Objective:

Develop a robust, validated computational model to study the effects of bilge keel shapes (extent and orientation) on roll motions, and use this model to provide guidance on their design.

Summary:

The work performed under this project since inception will be summarized in the next pages. The reader can find additional information (including copies of theses, conference papers, presentations, and movies of results) on the FPSO web site at UT Austin:

<http://cavity.cc.utexas.edu/kinnas/fpso/>

We have embarked on an effort to develop a computational technique for the prediction of the hydrodynamic coefficients of 2-D hulls subject to roll.
