1992). The authors also found that the use of a single, unidimensional measure of self-esteem was insufficient to capture the complexity of the construct. They argued that self-esteem is a multidimensional construct that includes both global and specific self-esteem. Global self-esteem refers to a general sense of self-worth, while specific self-esteem refers to a sense of self-worth in a particular domain (e.g., academic achievement). The authors suggested that a multidimensional measure of self-esteem, such as the Self-Esteem Inventory (SEI; Rosenberg, 1979), would be more appropriate for capturing the complexity of the construct. The SEI is a 10-item scale that measures both global and specific self-esteem. It includes items such as "I am proud of myself" (global) and "I am proud of my academic achievement" (specific). The authors found that the SEI was a reliable and valid measure of self-esteem, and that it was able to distinguish between individuals with high and low self-esteem. They concluded that the use of a multidimensional measure of self-esteem is essential for understanding the role of self-esteem in academic achievement.
