

Designing an experiment involves many important statistical concepts and procedures.

Statistical concepts such as randomization, control, and replication are used to design experiments that can answer questions about cause and effect. For example, to test the effect of a treatment on a response, you would compare the response of a group of subjects who receive the treatment to the response of a group of subjects who do not receive the treatment. The subjects in each group should be randomly selected from a population of interest. The subjects in the treatment group should be randomly selected from the population of interest, and the subjects in the control group should be randomly selected from the same population of interest.
