Abstract A stress response characterized by an elevated stress reaction and a diminished level of a protective stress response, referred to as the "type A" pattern, has been associated with atherosclerosis. However, the underlying mechanisms are unclear. The present study examined the relationship between the type A pattern and the autonomic nervous system (ANS) in a sample of 100 healthy men. The type A pattern was defined as a combination of high levels of stress reaction and low levels of protective stress response. The ANS was measured using a heart rate variability (HRV) analysis. The results showed that the type A pattern was associated with a higher level of stress reaction and a lower level of protective stress response. This pattern was also associated with a higher level of ANS activity. The findings suggest that the type A pattern may be a marker for a higher level of ANS activity, which in turn may be a marker for a higher level of atherosclerosis.
