Although it is somewhat inevitable, it is equally easy to generalize knowledge incorrectly and indeed, a generalization may be misleading. For example, the probability of being killed while on a flight is generally extremely small, yet the generalization "flights are not dangerous" is false. Similarly, although the probability of being kidnapped is also small, the generalization "it is not dangerous to travel" is false. Thus, while we cannot deny that there are many things that are dangerous, there are also many things that are not dangerous. In fact, the probability of being kidnapped is small, but the probability of being killed is not. This is why it is important to be careful about generalizing knowledge.
