

Separation of powers

I. What is the separation of powers?

The doctrine of the separation of powers requires that the principal institutions of state— executive, legislature and judiciary—should be clearly divided in order to safeguard citizens' liberties and guard against tyranny. One of the earliest and clearest statements of the separation of powers was given by French social commentator and political thinker Montesquieu in 1748.

According to a strict interpretation of the separation of powers, none of the three branches may exercise the power of the other, nor should any person be a member of any two of the branches.

By creating separate institutions it is possible to have a system of checks and balances between them. But the United Kingdom does not have a classic separation of powers that, for example, applies in the United States, France, and Algeria.

II. Separation of powers : refers to the division of a state's government into "branches", each with separate, independent powers and responsibilities, so that the powers of one branch are not in conflict with those of the other branches. The typical division into three branches of government, sometimes called the trias politica model, includes a legislature, an executive, and a judiciary.

I. legislative power :

The authority under the constitution to make laws and to alter or repeal them. A legislature is an assembly with the authority to make laws. The legislative body acts as a committee or body. They are often combined with the executive and judicial powers of government.

There are legislative bodies all around the world. The Nigerian Parliament. When you hear legislature, think "making laws".

2. Executive power:

In political systems based on the separation of powers, such as the Nigerian government, authority is distributed between several branches or bodies of government being concentrated in the hands of a single person or group. The authority that each branch is subject to
