

Youth and Drug Addiction

In the late 1990s, there was an epidemic that spread across the world and caused chaos everywhere it appeared. This was called the opioid crisis. Adults and teens had been introduced to opioids such as heroin and fentanyl. Results have shown that 2.14 million people ages 12 and older had an opioid use disorder in 2016, including 153,000 12- to 17-year-olds (Volkow). Prescription and over the counter drugs are often abused by 12th graders along with alcohol, marijuana, and tobacco. Teenager often do drugs to seem cool or escape from reality because of issues at home or school.

This a major problem because they are becoming addicted to the drugs and end up overdosing. Marijuana, Nicotine, and Synthetic drugs have the highest numbers of use among young adults. Although the use of opioids has decreased teens are still using drugs such as heroine, cocaine, and many other drugs. In the book dreamland by Sam quinones he opens up with a story about Matt Schoonover. Matt was a boy who grew up in a neighborhood where teenagers often smoke and drank alcohol. In his junior year he began smoking and drinking just like everyone around him.

Then he moved on to prescription painkillers which he became addicted to at some point. Matt then switched to OxyContin which is a pill that treats moderate to severe pain in the body. The national institute on drug abuse states that peeling off the coating then using it will give you a sense euphoria which is like the feeling of heroin. Schoovner ended up switching to heroin and ended up overdosing after getting treatment for his addiction. This is an example of a teenager who was influenced by external factors to start using drugs.

Teenagers often find themselves becoming addicted to drugs like oxycontin, heroin, and many other synthetic drugs. OxyContin is a drug that has yet to fall of the charts pertaining to usage. The national institute on drug abuse shows that the usage of Oxycontin has increased over the past three years for teenagers. Eighth graders had a percentage of 80, tenth had a percentage of 2.20, and twelfth graders with 2.70 percent. The percentages have decreased since 2016 but continue to rise as the years pass. Heroin is another example of an addictive drug.

Rollins states that the number of teens from the age 12-17 who had used heroin increased from one percent to eight percent. Research also showed that middle class white males had a higher percentage of using heroin then other ethnicities (Martens). Young adults use heroin because of the feelings that they get from it. When heroin is used the user gets a rush of happiness and clouded thoughts. This drug is addicting because after those feelings are gone the user becomes depressed and often wants to experience that happiness again. The national institute on drug abuse states that in 2017 about seventy percent of eighth and twelfth graders have used heroin once or twice in their lifetime. Teenagers tend not to think about
