

SUMMARY OF PLANT HORMONES

What are plant hormones?

Plant hormones are chemicals which allow the plant to respond to its ever changing environment.

Although plants are rooted organisms that don't have a nervous system, they can still successfully coordinate their responses to aid their survival. Hormones can be used to communicate between nearby cells, different parts of the plant and even between different plants. One type of response shown by plants are tropisms. These are growth responses which allow parts of a plant to either grow towards, or away from a stimulus, depending on what is favourable for the plant's survival.

How do plant hormones work?

Each type of hormone can have several different roles within the plant.

Depending on whether the hormone is in relatively low or high concentrations can impact on how they function. Different plant hormones can interact with one another, also affecting their function. Plant hormones can sometimes amplify one another's effect, this is known as synergism. If hormones have an opposite effect however to one another, it is known as antagonism. Therefore the fine balance between the concentration of the various plant hormones is vital in coordinating the plant's responses to its changing environment.
