Ogee or Overflow Spillways

4.1 INTRODUCTION

The ogee or overflow spillway is the most common type of spillway. It has a control weir that is ogee or S-shaped. It is a gravity structure requiring sound foundation and is preferably located in the main river channel, although there are many spillways located on the flanks in excavated channels due to foundation problems. The structure divides naturally into three zones: the crest, the rear slope, and the toe. An ogee crest and apron may comprise an entire spillway, such as the overflow portion of a concrete gravity dam, or the ogee crest may only be the central structure for some other type of spillway. Because of its high discharge efficiency, the nappe-shaped profile is used for most spillway control crests.

4.2 THE SPILLWAY CREST PROFILE

Normally the crest is shaped to conform to the lower surface of the nappe from a fully aerated sharp-crested weir as shown in Figure 1. The pressures on the crest will then be atmospheric. The shape of such a profile depends upon the head, the inclination of the upstream face of the overflow section, and the height of that section above the floor of the entrance channel. Bazin (1886 to 1888) made the first comprehensive laboratory investigation of nappe shapes. Early crest shapes were usually based on a simple parabola designed to fit the trajectory of the falling nappe in the general form wherein the values of various constants have been evaluated by Creager, Justin and Hinds, Ippen and Blaisdell. Grzywienski (1951) has discussed at length the development of various profiles.

$$y/H = A (x/H)^2 + B (x/H) + C + D \quad (1)$$
