Wilderness Visitors, Experiences, and Management Preferences David N. Cole, 2008 We explore the extent to which visitor experiences and management preferences vary between the most heavily used places in wilderness and places that are less popular We also contrast day and overnight users The study was conducted in Forest Service administered wildernesses in Oregon and Washington using both on site and mailback questionnaires The on site questionnaires were administered as visitors exited the wilderness at 36 trailheads in 13 wildernesses The trail use ranged from very high to moderate To include visitors who selected low use trails we sent mailback questionnaires to self issue permit holders We describe visitor characteristics trip characteristics motivations and experiences encounters with other groups attitudes toward recreation management and opinions about the Forest Service Differences related to use level were surprisingly small Differences between day and overnight users were also small We found evidence that wilderness experiences were adversely affected at high use locations but most visitors consider these effects to be of little importance Most visitors to the more popular places make psychological adjustments to heavy use allowing most of them to find solitude and have what they consider a real wilderness experience Consequently most are not supportive of use limits to avoid people related problems We draw conclusions about potential indicators standards and management actions for heavily used places in wilderness
