Marshall's correspondence is a richly documented and lively chronicle. The correspondence was important to him, and under the same collection of letters, with its handwritten annotations and printed sheets, survives numerous printed letters exchanged with English officials. The volumes (nos. 1-4) cover the period in the United States that began with travel to Massachusetts. Marshall left little or no record of his personal life while engaged in government service in England. As that correspondence, including financial, professional and the personal documents, comprising the majority of the first three volumes, is written in a formal, even stilted, style, the letters tend to be tedious and somewhat superficial. But, as we learn more about this period of his life, the value of these letters will be appreciated. The printed sheets, often containing handwritten notes and sketches, provide a more personal and lively view of the young man.

Household expenditures across the border generally are the same. But important differences in the way that expenditures are reported to the general ledger can be seen in the way that the two countries use their general ledger. In the United States, the general ledger is the income tax return. In the United Kingdom, the general ledger is the annual accounts. The two countries use different general ledger systems, and this can lead to differences in the way that expenditures are reported to the general ledger.

Multi-state longitudinal studies are generally very expensive. Sometimes several years' data on a particular variable are available. In such cases, the opportunity to follow each individual over time may be severely limited (e.g., the general ledger, marketing and personnel in the pharmaceutical industry are not interested in the same set of questions). In the longitudinal studies, the study may have many subjects, but the number of subjects in each of many states (e.g., following and never about a given drug) may be small and may vary. The researcher faces the following problems and solutions:
