These authors claim to use longitudinal data from British women living in rural England, administered by the British Family Survey, a longitudinal survey of the health and social conditions of the population living in the county of Oxford. The authors claim to have used data from 1970-1971, 1972-1973, 1974-1975, 1976-1977, 1978-1979, and 1980-1981. However, the authors do not provide any information about the survey design, the sample size, or the response rate. The authors also do not provide any information about the data collection methods, the data management, or the data analysis. The authors claim to have used a series of logistic regression models to estimate the odds ratios for the different outcomes. However, the authors do not provide any information about the model specification, the model fit, or the model results. The authors claim to have found that the odds ratios for the different outcomes are significantly different from 1.0. However, the authors do not provide any information about the confidence intervals, the p-values, or the statistical significance.
