Wendell's correspondence to his Kentucky physician, Dr. J. H. Matthews, in the 1850s, reveals how much he depended on the help of others. His letters show a reliance on his friends, family, and physicians for advice and support. He often wrote to his friends, asking for help with his health and for advice on how to live. He also wrote to his physicians, asking for help with his health and for advice on how to live. His letters show a deep sense of his own weakness and a reliance on others for help. Students also often perceived academic achievement and work as good investments in the long run, in spite of current costs. They identified social, economic, and educational opportunities not readily made available to non-poor students. Most students were indeed quite flexible in the following statement: even students who considered the present costs, still felt that a good investment. Even when the present costs were perceived as too high, the investment was still considered good in the long run.
