It is not sufficient to simply use the word "preventing" to describe a behavior that prevents a negative outcome. For example, the word "preventing" is used in the following sentence: "The purpose of the intervention was to prevent the children from using the word 'no' to refuse to follow the instructions." This sentence is problematic because it implies that the children were using the word "no" to refuse to follow the instructions, which is not the case. The word "preventing" is used to describe a behavior that prevents a negative outcome, but it does not describe the behavior itself. The word "preventing" is used to describe a behavior that prevents a negative outcome, but it does not describe the behavior itself.
