

CHAPTER 3

Portland cement concrete

15. <http://www.merriam-webster.com/dictionary/paraphrase>

Concrete refers to a mass of inorganic materials, consisting of binder and particles, where particles are bound together by the binder. There are many types of concrete, which usually depend on the type of binder, such as Portland cement concrete, asphalt concrete, and polymer concrete. Portland cement concrete is the most widely used construction material. In this chapter, the term concrete refers to Portland cement concrete unless noted otherwise.

Consequently, while other building materials, concrete in general, and reinforced concrete in particular, are subject to fairly rapid rates of deterioration, fibreglass-reinforced plastic and other FRP materials are much longer lasting and proven, and are stronger, more durable, and more resistant to corrosion, acids and alkalis, moisture and pollution, chemical and mechanical degradation, and temperature, vibration and settlement, and are available in a wide range of shapes and sizes, and in a wide range of colors. Fibreglass-reinforced plastic is a particularly strong and durable material, and is available in a wide range of shapes and sizes, and in a wide range of colors.

Thermal pollution is both an economic, safety, and the world's most widely used construction material. Due to its versatility, durability, and resistance, and concrete is employed as follows:
