Research Guide: Assessing Sources

Evaluating the credibility and value of a source can be very difficult, particularly when doing research using the Internet. Below are some basic guidelines to help you select reliable sources and use them to learn accurate information about a given subject.

Characteristics of Reliable Sources

Authority: Who is sponsoring the information? The URL can provide information about the origin of the source. The following are examples of how you can determine the type of organization that is sponsoring the content for a specific website:

Site ending in . . .

.edu are usually educational institutions and generally a good source of information.

.gov are government entities and usually good sources for statistical information.

.org are typically non-profit organizations often set up as a public service. Be on the lookout for political agendas and biases.

Example: If you are looking for information about gun control, there may be sites such as gun.com that are not about gun ownership, laws, etc. Sites affiliated with gun rights (such as gun ownership) will probably be listed as .org, such as gunowners.org or military.org.

Biases

While researching, there are usually not fact-based and as a general rule should not be used for conducting research.

Online resources or journals

These articles often contain a detailed bibliography and list specific sources as evidence for claims and statistics.

Online news sources

Usually every news story and article news outlet has an online site or its local affiliate. It is important to realize that while they do provide news, they are also governed by the circumstances involved and may present some information that is opinion or fact-based.

Television/news video news broadcasts

When viewing video keep in mind that if it is not from a source that can be accurately documented with images, dates, and key information like who, what, where, when, why and how, then the source may not be credible.
