

Oxidation – Reduction Packet

Oxidation-reduction (redox) reactions are a part of many biological processes. Oxidation reactions are often responsible for the energy stored in molecules, especially those that are used to produce ATP. Oxidation reactions are also involved in the breakdown of molecules, such as the breakdown of glucose to produce energy.

Oxidation reactions involve the loss of electrons from a molecule. This can be thought of as the molecule being "oxidized". Reduction reactions involve the gain of electrons by a molecule. This can be thought of as the molecule being "reduced". The process of oxidation and reduction is often coupled, meaning that one molecule is oxidized while another is reduced.

Redox reactions are important in many biological processes, including the production of energy. For example, the breakdown of glucose to produce energy involves a series of redox reactions. In these reactions, glucose is oxidized to produce carbon dioxide and water, while oxygen is reduced to produce water. The energy released from these reactions is used to produce ATP.

Redox reactions are also involved in the transport of electrons. For example, the electron transport chain is a series of redox reactions that transfer electrons from one molecule to another. This process is essential for the production of energy in the mitochondria.

Redox reactions are also involved in the transport of protons. For example, the proton pump is a series of redox reactions that transfer protons from one molecule to another. This process is essential for the production of energy in the mitochondria.
