Abstract: The purpose of this study was to determine if there were differences in the prevalence of risk factors associated with falls between nursing home residents who had fallen at least once during the previous year and those who had not. A cross-sectional survey design was used. Data were collected from 106 nursing homes in Michigan. Residents were interviewed about their history of falling, demographic characteristics, and risk factors for falling. Results showed that residents who had fallen at least once during the previous year were more likely than nonfallers to have one or more risk factors for falling. These results suggest that fall prevention programs should focus on identifying and addressing risk factors for falls.
