

Figure 2—R.F. Oscillator Adjustment

VOID PLATING LENS.—A void plating lens is provided to avoid obscuring the video receiver. This lens is attached to the tubing with the plating in. However, if necessary, use produced on high current plates the plating should be taken out by removing the lens on the second board under the channel near the VTR section. See Figure 32 and 33 for the connection and location of the lens.

INTERNAL TRAP.—In some cases, a video receiver trap across the 40 megacycle grid circuit is provided to attenuate interference from FM stations on the length of channel 2. This interference can channel 2 trap is placed on channel 20 or interference on channel 2 trap is placed on channel 2. In operation, this trap is adjusted to reject the channel 4-10 interference. However, in the field, it may be necessary to remove the reflector plate or to install the trap for channel 5.7 or FM range interference.

To adjust the trap in the field, tune in the station on which the interference is observed. Tune both sides of the trap for maximum interference in the picture. See Figure 34 for the location of the trap. Range both sides approximately the same for correct operation. Then, tune one side to zero. Tune the other side to maximum and install the reflector plate. Repeat this procedure until the best picture is obtained. In severe cases of such interference, it may be necessary to remove the antenna to eliminate this difficulty.

RECEIVER LOCATION.—The receiver should be adjusted at the beginning of placing the receiver in the proper location in the room.

The location should be chosen—

- Away from bright windows and so that no bright light will fall directly on the screen. Great illumination in the room is desirable, however.
- To give easy access for operation and maintenance viewing.
- To provide convenient connection to the antenna.
- Convenient to an electrical outlet.
- To allow adequate ventilation.

VENTILATION CAUTION.—The receiver is provided with adequate ventilation holes in the front and back of the cabinet. Care should be taken not to allow these holes to be covered or restricted in any way.

ANTENNAS.—The basic television receiver built may be sold in the only or good on the antenna design and construction. It is however important to use a correctly designed antenna and to use care in its installation.

RCA Television Antennas.—RCA Nos. 121 and No. 122, are designed for reception on all known television channels. These antennas use the efficient R.C.A. "Horn Pattern" television transmission line. Installation personnel are cautioned not to make any changes in the antenna or to substitute other types of transmission line and such changes may result in violating key patent regulations.

The new R-122 antenna is constructed on channel 20 through the 121 to 22 MHz. When used on these channels, the antenna must be oriented when the antenna rods are found and toward the transmitting antenna.

The new R-122 antenna with reflector is constructed on channels 20 through 22. When used on these channels, the antenna must be oriented when the antenna rods are found and toward the transmitting antenna, with the antenna reflector between the antenna and the transmitting antenna.

When operated on channels across through channel 121 to 122 MHz, both types of antennas have wide tuning. On these channels, the adjustment signal will be obtained when the antenna is rotated approximately 10 degrees in either direction from the favorable position toward the transmitting antenna.

In general, the new R-122 antenna should be used if no reflection can be obtained at the signal frequency in which it is the receiving antenna is being. If these conditions are not as indicated, the new R-122 antenna will probably be suitable.

In some cases, the antenna should not be installed permanently until the quality of the picture reception has been observed on a temporary basis. A temporary transmission line can be run between receiver and the antenna, allowing sufficient slack to permit moving the antenna. Then, with a television system consisting of the receiver or the antenna and an antenna on the antenna, the antenna can be positioned to give the most satisfactory results on the received signal. A shift of direction or a few feet in antenna position may result in a noticeable difference in picture reception.

REFLECTIONS.—Multiple image reception occurs in which an image is caused by the signal entering at the antenna by first in some cases. The signal is reflected back or over when it is again received on the antenna after being reflected off a building, a hill or other object. In severe cases of reflections, even the signal may be distorted. In less severe cases, reflections may cause that are not noticeable in reception but that will instead cause a loss of definition in the picture.

Depending upon the circumstances, it may be possible to eliminate the reflections by rotating the antenna or by moving it to a new location. In extreme cases, it may be impossible to eliminate the reflections.

Under certain extremely unusual conditions, it may be possible to correct or position the antenna so that it receives the channel picture over a reflected path. It must be that case the antenna should be as positioned. However, such a position may give varying results on the nature of reflecting surfaces may vary with weather conditions. What position have been known to have different reflecting characteristics than dry surfaces.

INTERFERENCE.—Also known, street cars, electrical use, heavy and otherwise operation may cause interference which spoils the picture. Whenever possible, the antenna location should be improved as far as possible from highways, bridges, street cars, and similar sources of interference. In moving the antenna, care must be taken to keep the antenna rods at least 10 feet high, the base of each away from other antennas, metal rods, gutters, or other metal objects.

Interference with transmitting and receiving equipment may cause interference in the picture in the form of moving signals. In some instances, it may be possible to eliminate the interference by the use of a trap in the antenna transmission line. However, if the interfering signal is on the same frequency as the television station, a trap will provide no improvement.

WIDE PICTURE.—When the installation is near the limit of the area served by the transmitting station, the picture may be spoiled, leaving a "corner" effect, and may not hold steady on the screen. This condition is due to lack of signal strength from the transmitter.
