Abstract—The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of a 10-week, 100-hr, nonclinical, predoctoral internship on the self-reported confidence of students in their ability to perform various tasks associated with the practice of counseling. The study was conducted with 100 students who completed a pretest, a posttest, and a follow-up test. The results of the study indicated that the students' self-reported confidence in their ability to perform various tasks associated with the practice of counseling increased significantly from pretest to posttest and follow-up test. The results also indicated that the students' self-reported confidence in their ability to perform various tasks associated with the practice of counseling was significantly higher than the confidence of students who did not complete the internship. The results of the study have implications for the development of predoctoral internships and for the assessment of the effectiveness of such programs.
