The paper presents a theoretical model of the perceived effort of the hand in reaching to grasp. It is assumed that the perceived effort is a function of the distance from the hand to the target. The model is based on the assumption that the perceived effort is proportional to the distance from the hand to the target. The model is tested by comparing the perceived effort of the hand in reaching to grasp with the distance from the hand to the target. The results show that the perceived effort of the hand in reaching to grasp is proportional to the distance from the hand to the target.
