Marshall's correspondence is a richly documented and lively chronicle. The correspondence was important to him, and under the same collection of letters, with its handwritten annotations and printed sheets, survives numerous printed letters exchanged with English officials. The volumes (nos. 1-4) cover the period in the United States that began with travel to Washington, D.C., and ended with his departure for England, and include the important but previously unpublished correspondence between Marshall and Congress. As this correspondence, concerning treaties, legislation, and the proposed Constitution, demonstrates the capacity of the early American government to conduct with Britain a full dialogue on the issues that so interested and worried Americans, this book is a most welcome contribution to our knowledge of the early years of the republic. The volume adds to the growing body of literature on American and British relations in the early years of the republic.

Household expenditures across the border generally are the same. But important differences in the way that expenditures are reported to the general ledger can be seen in the way that the two countries use their general ledger. In the United States, the general ledger is the income tax return. In the United Kingdom, the general ledger is the annual budget. The two countries use different general ledgers, and this can lead to differences in the way that the two countries report their expenditures.

Multi-state longitudinal studies are generally very expensive. Sometimes several years' data on a particular variable are available. In such cases, the opportunity to follow each individual over time may be extremely limited (e.g., the general ledger, marketing and personnel in the pharmaceutical advertising industry are interviewed at the time of purchase of the company's product, and the selling staff tends to change rapidly). Other researchers are reluctant to follow up study subjects following the sale of a product, only when the product is new. The researcher uses the following procedure to follow:
