These findings suggest, we hypothesized, we would see less consistent responses across measures. Indeed, we found that the weights of all pairs and triads varied with the perceived similarity score, indicating that the weights of all comparisons were influenced by the weight of all comparisons. The expected weights of each pair, however, were not the same across all measures. In general, perceived weights in triads were higher than in pairs, and the perceived weights in triads were higher than in pairs.
