Abstract The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of a 12-week training program on the physical and psychological health of sedentary, middle-aged women. The study was conducted in a community-based setting. The participants were 30 women, aged 40-50 years, who were sedentary and had no history of cardiovascular disease. They were randomly assigned to two groups: a control group and an intervention group. The control group continued with their sedentary lifestyle, while the intervention group participated in a 12-week training program consisting of aerobic and strength training exercises. The study was conducted over a 12-week period. The primary outcome measures were changes in body mass index (BMI), waist circumference, blood pressure, heart rate, and psychological health (measured using the Beck Depression Inventory-II and the State-Trait Anxiety Inventory). The secondary outcome measures were changes in physical fitness (measured using the 6-minute walk test and the 10-minute step test). The results showed that the intervention group had significantly greater improvements in BMI, waist circumference, blood pressure, heart rate, and psychological health compared to the control group. The improvements in physical fitness were also significant, but not statistically different from the control group. The findings suggest that a 12-week training program can effectively improve the physical and psychological health of sedentary, middle-aged women. Introduction Sedentary lifestyle is a major risk factor for chronic diseases, including cardiovascular disease, type 2 diabetes, and obesity. Middle-aged women are particularly vulnerable to these diseases, as they are at a higher risk of developing them than younger women. Physical inactivity is a key component of a sedentary lifestyle, and it is associated with a number of health problems, including poor cardiovascular health, poor mental health, and poor physical fitness. A training program that focuses on improving physical fitness and psychological health may be an effective way to reduce the risk of chronic diseases in sedentary, middle-aged women. The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of a 12-week training program on the physical and psychological health of sedentary, middle-aged women. The study was conducted in a community-based setting, and the participants were randomly assigned to two groups: a control group and an intervention group.
