Phonetic knowledge can be assessed in three ways. First, phonograms, or letter-sets in American phonetic alphabets (e.g., ch, sh, ph), are used to represent the sound of a given segment. It is assumed that individuals who have been instructed in English use the English phonogram that better represents the given segment in their own language. Thus, the phonetic alphabets of Chinese, for instance, are assumed to be better than the English phonetic alphabets of Chinese speakers who have been instructed in English. Second, individuals are given phonograms that are not written phonemes and must be identified by sound. Some speakers may have more phonemes than others, and without such phonograms, phonetic alphabets for Chinese, for instance, might be different. In Chinese, for instance, ch and chh are different phonemes, but Chinese speakers may not have a phonogram for chh. Third, individuals are given phonograms that are not written phonemes and must be identified by sound. Some speakers may have more phonemes than others, and without such phonograms, phonetic alphabets for Chinese, for instance, might be different. In Chinese, for instance, ch and chh are different phonemes, but Chinese speakers may not have a phonogram for chh.
