These authors stress the fact that although their results showed a trend of higher perceived vulnerability to drug abuse among African-Americans, the trend was not statistically significant. The authors suggest that the lack of statistical significance may be due to the small sample size of the study. The authors also note that the results of the study are consistent with previous research showing that African-Americans are more likely to use drugs than Caucasians. The authors conclude that the results of the study suggest that there is a need for further research on the factors that influence drug use among African-Americans.
