Lesson Summary

Describing Populations

Ecological Systems Most ecologists study populations. Ecologists study a particular community of organisms (e.g., plants, animals, and various microorganisms) living in an area.

Change after Change They plan a population study using the geographic range of organisms, changes occurring in time. For example, the population of bacteria in a flask doubles a certain time interval. They will let a certain population of fish grow for a set time span. They will change the area where the fish live.

Growth Rate The number of organisms in a population change over time in a set geographic area. Population numbers can grow rapidly when resources are abundant, but they can slow down when resources are scarce.
