

Landscape Irrigation Design Manual

The area under the first 60% of the sprinkler's radius is generally sufficiently irrigated to grow vegetation without the need for an overlapping sprinkler. Beyond this 60% line, the amounts of water, diminishing with distance, become less and less effective and eventually will not support plants.

The maximum spacing recommended, therefore, is where the sprinkler is located, so its 60% of radius line meets the 60% line of its neighbor. This is the 60% of diameter that was noted earlier. The less effective, last 40% of each sprinkler's throw is overlapped into the more effective close-in coverage of the adjacent sprinkler. In cases where very coarse soil, high winds, low humidity or high heat inhibit effective irrigation, closer spacing is recommended.

Head-to-head, or 50% sprinkler spacing, is the most common spacing used in landscape irrigation. Where winds are a threat to good coverage, spacing as close as 40% may be required. When sprinkler spacing is stretched, turfgrass will exhibit dry spots within the area
