

Roots

Reinforced trees have shallow root systems because the reinforced floor only has a thin layer of nutrient rich soil.

Buttress roots are large roots that spread around the base of the tree, close to the ground, to widen the base of the tree and increase stability.

Stilt roots grow from branches, shoot towards the soil. When they reach the soil, they anchor and spread shallow roots underground. Stilt roots prop the tree up to make it more stable.

Leaves

High rain fall levels. To adapt to high rainfall, plants have developed special leaf features.

Some have pretty big to channel water runoff. This is how leaves and flying insects prevent soil erosion, stop soil drying.

Some flowers in rainforest only to last overlapping. It also reduces through the leaf's surface.

Leaving is an adaptation by trees. The leaves grow close together to avoid shading the leaves below. This is common in the rainforest, where plants compete for sunlight.

A below the canopy have adapted to the ground forest with a large surface area to absorb light and increase photosynthesis.

In these humid areas it is not all about to prevent soil erosion and soil drying. It is to make the leaves overlap to reach the soil and prevent leaves from being ripped by high winds (storm coming).

Some plants have leaves that require more of sunlight than an island, which is their ability to photosynthesis. This pattern is common. They are green.

woody vines that attach tendrils, or suckers, to support them. Lianas can grow from the ground towards the canopy, or grow from the tree roots towards the ground. Once they are in the canopy and flowers of lianas spread out for absorption. Lianas depend on the support of trees, or hosts, for growth and survival.

Epiphytes

Plants that grow on the surface of other plants. Epiphytes do not need soil to grow roots.

Some epiphytes, like the strangler fig, are large. Strangler figs attach to a host tree and then grow down towards the forest floor, where they plant their roots into the soil. Strangler figs eventually smother and kill their host.

With the air, the branches spread to capture the water.
