

- 9 Vance waded in. The water came about to his navel. He went steadily on for some distance and then, to my bewilderment, turned his back slightly on the stream. It was the first deviation from the plan.
- 10 He took another step or two, stopped, suddenly abandoned his stick to the stream and yelled to us: "Let out the rope!"
- 11 I was horrified by this second deviation from the plan. What on earth was he up to? Before we had even properly grasped his intention, he had thrown himself on the stream and was swimming a breast stroke. As was inevitable, the stream at once caught him and quickly swept him to where it foamed and bubbled like a waterfall over the edge of the track. The unexpected speed with which all of this had happened was the most terrifying thing about it. Even so, Vance had got almost to the far bank, was reaching for it — when the water swept him over the edge and he disappeared from our view.
- 12 Quillan and I were braced for the shock. The rope tightened in a flash. The strain was tremendous. Vance's body, no longer water-borne but suspended out of sight below the edge of the rocky track, with the weight of the water streaming on top of it, strained the rope to the utmost. Yet it held.
- 13 I think it would have continued to hold if the angle and the violent impact of the water on the body had not now with incredible speed whipped Vance along the sharp edge of the rocks, swung him from the far side towards our bank and chafed the rope badly in the process. It still held for a second or two. We worked our way along it towards him — were within two metres of him — when the rope snapped.

Paragraph 8

Laurens, Quillan and two of the porters prepare the rope while Vance takes a big stick which they had cut for him.

Paragraph 9

Vance wades in and the author is shocked and worried when Vance turns his back on the stream. This is not part of the plan.

Paragraph 10

Vance moves forward, lets go of the stick and shouts to the others to let out more rope.

Paragraph 11

The author is shocked when he sees Vance trying to swim across. Everything happens fast. Vance has almost reached the far bank when the stream sweeps him away and over the edge of the waterfall.

Paragraph 12

The group prepare to hold fast as Vance falls over. The rope does not snap.

Paragraph 13

The rope, though strained by the violent impact of the water and damaged by the sharp rocks, holds for a few seconds. They move forward to try and save him. But when they are just 2 metres from him, the rope snaps. We infer that Vance has crashed to his death below.
